I. INTRODUCTION

[1] Mr. T. and Ms. D. separated in 2008 after a three-year marriage. They have a son, V., who was two years of age at the time of separation. The parties' widely divergent views concerning the parenting of V. contributed significantly to the conflict that characterized their brief marriage.

[2] The custody and guardianship of V. is the central issue. Mr. T. sought joint custody and guardianship with equal parenting time and shared decision-making authority. Ms. D. sought sole custody (or, alternatively, joint custody with primary residency) and joint guardianship with final decision-making authority concerning V.'s health care and other significant issues.

[3] A central matter of contention between the parties is whether V. should be vaccinated against common childhood infectious diseases. V., now 5 years of age, has not received any vaccinations. Ms. D. has had authority on an interim basis since separation to decide all matters concerning V.'s health care, and she has refused to permit him to have any vaccinations. Mr. T. believes that V. should receive the series of vaccinations recommended by provincial health care authorities for children, and asks to be granted the requisite decision-making authority concerning this issue.

[4] The remaining issues were child and spousal support and the division of family assets and debts.

II. FACTS

The parties

[5] Mr. T. is 55 years of age. He was born in Richmond, B.C. and was raised there. He obtained a degree in graphic design from Kwantlen College after completing a two-year program. Mr. T. worked on commercial fishing boats to fund post-graduate education, and attended the Art Centre College of Design in Los Angeles from 1978 to 1982. Thereafter, he worked in Los Angeles for about 18 months. He then returned to Vancouver where he worked as a graphic design artist. He also became involved in theatre productions, first as a backdrop designer and then as an actor.

[6] In 1995, Mr. T. lived in New York for two years to study figurative painting at the National Academy of Design. He continued to work as a freelance graphic artist when he returned to Vancouver, supplementing his income with work as an actor in theatre and television productions. He pursued visual art and carpentry as other interests.

[7] Ms. D. is 41 years of age. She was born in southern Ontario and was raised there. She attended Carleton University in Ottawa, graduating from the School of Architecture with great distinction at the age of 22. Following graduation, she worked in Turin, Italy for six months. She then accepted a position with a firm of architects in Barrie, Ontario, where she worked for four years. In 1994, Ms. D. moved to Toronto and worked for an architectural firm there for three years.

[8] In 1997, Ms. D. moved to Vancouver with her common law partner with whom she had lived for several years. She had been in Vancouver only a few days when her brother, who was living and working in Victoria, became very ill as a result of a brain aneurysm. Over the next four years, he suffered periodic seizures. Ms. D. took care of her brother during these episodes. At the same time, Ms. D. was hired by a Vancouver exhibit design firm to assist with their marketing in Europe.

[9] After a year or so with the firm, Ms. D. began performing exhibit design work for the firm. She was involved in the design of a number of large projects in British Columbia and abroad. Ms. D.'s work included the design of interactive and multi-media exhibits as well as overseeing the construction and project management of the exhibits.

Background to the relationship

[10] Mr. T. and Ms. D. were introduced to each other in 2003 by a mutual acquaintance. Mr. T. was living in a small rental apartment on West 3rd Avenue in the Kitsilano area of Vancouver. Ms. D. lived in an apartment on East 8th Avenue, which she owned. They began a relationship, but did not cohabit until after their marriage.

[11] The parties married in September 2005. Ms. D. had renovated and sold her apartment shortly before the marriage. She moved into Mr. T.'s apartment following the marriage.

[12] The marriage was the first for both parties. When they married, Mr. T. was 49 years of age; Ms. D. was 35. Ms. D. had been in a common law relationship previously. Mr. T. led no evidence concerning any prior relationships.

[13] From the outset of their marriage, Mr. T. and Ms. D. kept their finances entirely separate. They did not establish a joint bank account or obtain any joint credit cards. Throughout the marriage, they did not discuss their respective financial circumstances.

[14] At the time of the marriage, Ms. D. had approximately $90,000 in savings from her exhibit design work and the profit from the sale of her apartment. She kept those savings in her own bank account. She also had two credit cards, one with CIBC and the other with RBC. At some point during the marriage, Ms. D. obtained several more credit cards. She did not discuss her finances with Mr. T., nor did she show him her banking statements or credit card statements.

[15] Ms. D.'s income prior to the marriage fluctuated with the projects she obtained and the number of hours she worked on individual projects. She had worked on a contract basis with the Vancouver exhibit design firm. One year she earned a net income in the range of $55,000 as a result of the long hours of work she performed on an exhibit design project in Dubai. Other years her gross income was in the $40,000 to $45,000 range (Ms. D. described her income in terms of net income, which she said was $30,000 on average). Ms. D. could bill up to $100 per hour, depending on the nature and scope of the project, but projects were usually based on contracts with fixed prices which meant that the actual hourly rate was often much less.

[16] Mr. T.'s income several years before the marriage was derived primarily from his work as a graphic artist. He had obtained some work as an actor in the 1990s, but very little acting work was available in Vancouver after that time. Mr. T. earned a gross income in the range of $40,000 to $50,000. He worked from his apartment, but from time to time he rented modest office space to work on his freelance projects.

[17] Mr. T. had accumulated significant credit card debt in the mid-1990s when studying in New York. As a result of the ensuing financial difficulties and poor credit rating, he went without a credit card for several years. At the time of the marriage, he had one credit card with a $500 limit. He used that credit card throughout the marriage.

[18] Mr. T.'s one-bedroom Kitsilano apartment was 590 square feet in size. His rent was $875 per month. Ms. D.'s understanding was that the couple would look for a more spacious apartment following their marriage and that each would obtain a small office outside the home for their work. Mr. T. was willing to explore the possibility of moving to larger accommodation, but was concerned that the cost would put a strain on the couple's financial resources.

The relationship following V.'s birth

[19] Ms. D. became pregnant soon after the parties married. It was apparent from the evidence of both Ms. D. and Mr. T. that the pregnancy occurred before they had an opportunity to establish their relationship. What little foundation there was in the relationship began to erode soon after Ms. D. became pregnant.

[20] V. was born July 27, 2006. He was posterior prior to birth, and Ms. D. experienced a prolonged and very difficult labour as a result. Ms. D.'s mother, who had worked for many years as a registered nurse, was present for the home birth and assisted the midwife.

[21] V. was the first child for both Mr. T. and Ms. D.

[22] Conflict between the parties began almost immediately. Mr. T. was of the view that Ms. D. and her mother took over the care of V. without regard to his role as V.'s father and his ability to parent his son. Ms. D.'s perspective was that Mr. T. was not capable of providing safe and proper care for V.

[23] Unfortunately, the initial disagreement concerning V.'s care intensified as time went on.

[24] Both parties advanced a great deal of evidence at trial concerning the conflicts that developed between them in the ensuing two years. Much of it had little bearing on the issues in the litigation. Suffice to say the parties' marital relationship quickly deteriorated. Ms. D.'s focus was V. She established herself as V.'s primary caregiver and arbiter of all decisions concerning V.'s day-to-day care.

[25] Mr. T. was resentful of the fact that V. was now Ms. D.'s focus. He felt that Ms. D. left little room for their relationship, and even less room for his participation as a parent. In his words, he was "sidelined" as V.'s father. Ms. D.'s view was that Mr. T. simply abdicated any responsibility for V.'s care.

[26] The resulting dynamic became more complicated over time. Ms. D. began looking to Mr. T. for assistance in V.'s care as he progressed from infant to toddler, but on her terms. She had specific views concerning V.'s nutrition, clothing and safety. Ms. D. believed that V.'s daily routine required structure and stability. She insisted on a sugar-free diet for V. Mr. T. wanted to be involved in V.'s care, but disagreed with Ms. D.'s views as to what was best for V. He resented the control that Ms. D. insisted on exerting over every aspect of their son's care. Mr. T. wanted to be spontaneous about his time and activities with V., and tended to ignore the routines and dietary restrictions established by Ms. D.

[27] In short, the parties found as little common ground in their parenting of V. as they did in the other aspects of their relationship.

[28] Mr. T. rented small temporary office space in Kitsilano a few blocks from the family's apartment and worked from there on his graphic design projects. He obtained most of his work from land development companies, who retained him to design logos, brochures and websites for their real estate developments.

[29] From time to time for approximately two years before the marriage, Mr. T. performed graphic design work for a company involved in a real estate development on the Sunshine Coast near Pender Harbour. In the first four or five months after the marriage, Mr. T. did more work on the project and completed it. The developer did not have the funds available at the time to pay Mr. T. for his work. Instead, Mr. T. agreed to accept one of the Pender Harbour lots in the development as payment of $100,000 for the work. Title to the lot was transferred to Mr. T. in 2007, approximately a year after he had finished the work. The lot was bare at the time, and remains bare; no improvements of any kind have been made. The parties visited the lot a few times. During one visit, Ms. D. drew a few sketches of a building structure that might suit the lot.

[30] Mr. T. placed all of his income in his account, but paid the rent on the apartment and bore the cost of the utilities. All of his income went toward the cost of living expenses and purchases of household items for the family.

[31] During the first year after V.'s birth, Ms. D. devoted her time to the infant's care. She had gained a great deal of weight during the pregnancy, and began a workout regimen at a local gym a few months after V. was born. Ms. D. would routinely go to the gym in the morning. Mr. T.'s work schedule was flexible, which permitted him to take care of V. in the mornings until about 10 a.m. when Ms. D. returned from the gym. According to Mr. T., he routinely cared for V. in the mornings while Ms. D. was at the gym. According to Ms. D., Mr. T. did care for V. some of the time. However, she said that her sister assumed responsibility of V. on many of those mornings.

[32] At some point in 2007, Ms. D. was asked by a former colleague to take on an exhibit design project for a residential development called Rivergreen in Richmond, B.C. She accepted the project work, which involved an intensive six-week work schedule. According to Ms. D., Mr. T. was not willing to take over V.'s care during the project. Instead, Ms. D. paid for her mother to travel to Vancouver to assist with child care. Ms. D.'s sister also helped with the care of V.

[33] Ms. D. received approximately $20,000 for her work on the Rivergreen project. She also received payments from time to time from a client who owed her $17,000 for work she had performed for him in 2005 and early 2006.

[34] Ms. D. placed the money she received from her projects in her personal accounts. However, she paid for groceries, clothing and necessities for V. and other household expenses. She also contributed to the rent when necessary.

The condominium purchase

[35] Ms. D. was not comfortable with the cramped living space in Mr. T.'s apartment, and she began looking for a two-bedroom apartment in the area. She could find nothing suitable within the family's budget. She decided to buy an apartment with a view to renovating it. She had enjoyed renovating her apartment on East 8th Avenue before the marriage, and had made a profit on its sale. Ms. D.'s father had made his living as a building contractor and was willing to come to Vancouver to help with renovations on a new place. Ms. D. knew that Mr. T. was a talented carpenter who was capable of performing some of the finishing work. In the fall of 2007, she found a small two-bedroom condominium for sale just a few blocks from the family's apartment which she thought would be suitable to buy.

[36] Property values in Vancouver had peaked at that time. Ms. D. was one of several buyers interested in the condominium, and paid over the asking price to obtain it. Mr. T. was of the view that they could not afford the expense, but Ms. D. proceeded with the purchase on her own. She made a small down payment from her savings. The mortgage, together with strata fees, totalled approximately $2,900 per month.

[37] At the outset, Ms. D.'s plan was to renovate the condominium and then live in it. She was concerned about the toxic nature of the paints and various building materials required to renovate the place, and wanted the renovations completed before the family moved in. The purchase of the apartment completed in November 2007. Ms. D. and Mr. T. continued to live in the family apartment in the meantime. As a result, they continued to pay $875 per month in rent as well as mortgage payments on the condominium.

[38] Ms. D. designed the interior improvements to the condominium. Her father and brother travelled to Vancouver from Ontario to help with the renovations. Mr. T. did some painting and carpentry work. However, the renovation was much more costly and time-consuming than Ms. D. had anticipated.

[39] The renovations were not completed by the spring of 2008. The cost of the mortgage and rental payments placed a significant strain on the parties' finances. Mr. T. took a $50,000 mortgage on the Pender Harbour property; from those funds he paid the mortgage and strata fees for approximately six months. The balance of the money was used for other family expenses. In May 2008, Mr. T. stopped doing graphic design work and spent six weeks working full-time on the renovations in an effort to move the project along.

[40] When Mr. T. returned to his graphic design work, he discovered there were very few projects available. Most of his clients had been affected by the downturn in the real estate market and did not require Mr. T.'s services. Mr. T. decided to start doing carpentry work instead. He has earned his living primarily as a carpenter since that time.

[41] In June or July 2008 Mr. T. told Ms. D. he would not continue to pay the mortgage and other expenses on the condominium. As a result, Ms. D. used her personal savings to meet the monthly expenses for the condominium and to pay for the renovations. She stopped contributing to the rent and utilities for the family apartment, but continued to pay for food.

[42] One of Ms. D.'s sisters lived in the condominium for a few months in 2008, but the place otherwise remained unoccupied for most of the year. The financial burden created by the project placed increasing strain on an already troubled marriage.

The breakdown of the marriage

[43] A constant source of conflict between the parties was the parenting of their son. Ms. D. became increasingly inflexible in matters concerning V. Mr. T. responded with impulsive and immature behavior. During one of their arguments, Mr. T. tore up the couple's marriage certificate and V.'s birth certificate. On another occasion, he punched a hole in the apartment wall. He upended the living room furniture on a third occasion. On a few occasions Mr. T. left the apartment for a day or two.

[44] One of the fundamental disagreements that developed between Mr. T. and Ms. D. concerned the matter of whether to immunize V. Ms. D. was fundamentally opposed to all childhood vaccinations recommended by the provincial health authorities. Ms. D.'s opposition to the vaccination program was deep-rooted. As a child, she suffered from a number of medical conditions, including seizures, which occurred immediately after receiving routine childhood vaccinations. Her more recent experience dealing with her brother's seizure disorder magnified her fear of the possible consequences for V. should he receive the routine childhood vaccinations.

[45] Initially, Mr. T. acquiesced to Ms. D.'s wishes on the issue of vaccinations. However, as Mr. T. discussed the matter with others and did some reading on the issue, he became convinced that V. should receive the government-recommended vaccinations. Ms. D. remained steadfast in her refusal to consider immunization.

[46] Toward the end of 2008, the parties sought marriage counselling but after three or four sessions Ms. D. decided to take some time away from the relationship. In December 2008 she moved into the condominium with V. Mr. T., who was very unhappy with Ms. D.'s move, remained in the apartment.

V.'s care following separation

[47] During the early months of the separation, Mr. T. saw V. for an hour or two each day. V. attended toddler play classes at the Dunbar Community Centre, and Mr. T. was working on a home renovation project in the area. Mr. T. met Ms. D. and V. at the Centre during his lunch break in order to play with V. Mr. T. also had V. for six hours each Sunday while Ms. D. attended an acting seminar, a continuation of the parenting arrangement in place before their separation.

[48] Ms. D. would not permit V. to stay overnight with Mr. T. Her rationale for denying overnight visits included V.'s breastfeeding regimen. V. was 2 ½ years of age at the time of the couple's separation. He was still breastfeeding and, according to Ms. D., fed several times during the night.

[49] After living apart from Mr. T. for a few months, Ms. D. decided she wanted a divorce. She told Mr. T. of her decision in late March 2009. The animosity between the parties intensified. Ms. D.'s refusal to permit V. overnight visits with Mr. T. became a flashpoint. On two occasions, Mr. T. resisted bringing V. back to Ms. D.'s apartment at the agreed time. On both occasions, he told Ms. D. that V. wanted to sleep at his apartment. On the first occasion, Ms. D. went to Mr. T.'s apartment and took V. On the second occasion, Ms. D. phoned Mr. T.'s mother to advise her of the situation. Mr. T.'s mother called Mr. T. and persuaded him to return V. to Ms. D.

[50] In early April 2009 Ms. D. applied to the Provincial Court for sole custody of V. The parties attended a Judicial Case Conference on April 15, 2009. A consent order was reached on the following terms (among others):

- the completion of a Custody and Access Report;

- pending the completion of the Custody and Access Report, interim sole custody of V. by Ms. D. on a without prejudice basis;
- joint guardianship (Joyce Model) of V., with Ms. D. having final decision-making authority, until further court order;
- child support payable by Mr. T. in the amount of $388 per month (based on a Guideline Income of $42,000) commencing April 1, 2009 until further court order, with the issue of retroactive support deferred to the trial of the matter.

[51] On April 18, 2009, Mr. T. and Ms. D. agreed on an interim access schedule which gave Mr. T. approximately three hours of parenting time six days each week. During his access times on weekdays, Mr. T. took V. to toddler classes offered by community centres in the area.

[52] Mr. T. soon came to regret that he had consented to Ms. D. having interim sole custody of V.

[53] After a few months, Ms. D. decided that V.'s transition from one parent to the other six days per week was too much for him. She believed that the transitions were tiring V. and causing him stress. She asked Mr. T. to reduce the days of access, but Mr. T. refused. Ms. D. then unilaterally reduced Mr. T.'s access to three days per week.

[54] Mr. T. and Ms. D. participated in mediation with the Hon. Ross Colver between June and August 2009. The central issue was the parenting arrangements for V.

The sale of the condominium

[55] In June 2009 Ms. D. told Mr. T. that she could no longer afford to keep the condominium in which she and V. were living unless Mr. T. contributed to the monthly expenses. Mr. T. told Ms. D. that he could not afford to help her with the expenses. Ms. D.'s response was that she would be forced to sell the condominium unless he gave her some financial assistance with it. Mr. T. told Ms. D. that he did not agree to the sale of the condominium because he believed he was entitled to an interest in it, but said she was "on her own" and should "do whatever she needed to do".

[56] Ms. D. then listed the condominium for sale. It was not an optimal time in the Vancouver real estate market to list a property, and Ms. D. did not receive any offers that came even close to the listing price.

[57] In August 2009, while the parties were still in mediation, Mr. T. retained legal counsel and filed proceedings in this Court seeking divorce, joint custody and guardianship and property division. At the same time, he filed a Certificate of Pending Litigation on the condominium which was as yet unsold.

[58] In late August, 2009 Ms. D. received an offer on the condominium (after reducing the listing price three times) with a closing date of September 30. She advised Mr. T. of the offer, but he refused to have the lien removed at that time. Ms. D. found an apartment in the Kerrisdale area of Vancouver. She told Mr. T. that she would be moving once the condominium was sold, but would not agree to provide Mr. T. with her new address because she felt that he had been harassing her at the condominium.

The ex parte order

[59] According to Mr. T., Ms. D. had, on several occasions, expressed her desire to return to Ontario so that she and V. could live in close proximity to her family. Mr. T.'s counsel wrote to then counsel for Ms. D. seeking assurances that Ms. D. would not leave the jurisdiction with V. unless she obtained Mr. T.'s consent. Ms. D.'s counsel provided those assurances but sought Mr. T.'s consent to V.'s travel with Ms. D. to Ontario for a family visit.

[60] Mr. T. proceeded with his ex parte application and, on September 21, 2009 succeeded in obtaining an order for interim joint custody and terms restricting Ms. D.

from travelling outside the province or choosing a residence that was not within the boundaries of the City of Vancouver. The order also gave Mr. T. the additional access time he was seeking, but it did not address overnight access.

[61] Mr. T.'s evidence was that he decided to seek the order without notice to Ms. D. because he believed she was a flight risk. I heard a great deal of evidence from both parties about the circumstances surrounding the ex parte application. While I am satisfied Ms. D. was not a flight risk, it is not possible to determine whether Mr. T. lacked bona fides when making the ex parte application. The relationship of the parties was extremely volatile and the distrust was high. Ms. D.'s refusal to permit Mr. T. overnight access to V. was at the root of much of the conflict. The more Mr. T.'s attempts to gain overnight access were met with refusal, the more Mr. T. acted impulsively and aggressively. His behavior in turn prompted Ms. D. to conceal the address of her new residence from Mr. T., which created suspicion on his part that Ms. D. would go to even greater lengths to prevent his access to V. The judge hearing the ex parte application heard only Mr. T.'s suspicions and lacked the benefit of Ms. D.'s perspective on the issues between the parties. That, of course, is the danger of hearing applications and granting orders concerning custody and access without notice to one of the parties to the dispute.

[62] In any event, the order remained in place until September 2, 2011 when Ms. D. successfully applied to have it removed. Mr. Justice Crawford set the order aside and ordered that Mr. T. pay Ms. D.'s costs. Ms. D. sought special and punitive damages but no damages were awarded.

[63] In the two years between September 2009 and September 2011, while the ex parte order was in effect, the parties shared custody of V.

[64] Once he obtained the ex parte order, Mr. T. removed the CPL from the condominium. That occurred a few days before the sale of the condo closed. Ms. D. lost approximately $100,000 on the purchase, renovation and sale of the property.

V.'s dental care

[65] The ex parte order gave Mr. T. interim joint custody and additional access time to V., but it did not provide for overnight access or give Mr. T. authority to make decisions about V.'s medical care. Ms. D. continued to refuse overnight access on the basis that V. continued to breastfeed at night, and needed to breastfeed in order to maintain his health and emotional stability.

[66] When V. was 3 ½ years of age, his teeth began to show signs of serious decay. He had not yet had his first visit to a dentist. Mr. T. sought the opinion of Dr. Robert Patton, a dentist who performs extensive pediatric dentistry. Dr. Patton recommended that V. have his teeth capped. Mr. T. told Ms. D. that he would like Dr. Patton to perform the dental work. Ms. D. obtained opinions from two other dentists specializing in pediatric dentistry, both of whom were of the view that V. must undergo extensive and invasive dental surgery. Dr. Patton's recommended treatment was much less invasive. Ms. D. eventually authorized Dr. Patton to provide dental treatment to V.

[67] Mr. T. believed that breastfeeding was the cause of V.'s extensive tooth decay. Ms. D. blamed other factors. Neither party led evidence from Dr. Patton or expert opinion evidence concerning the likely cause of the problem. In any event, Dr. Patton provided extensive dental care to V. and the problem has been effectively addressed.

The Custody and Access Reports

[68] In late 2009, in accordance with the April 2009 order of Ehrcke P.C.J. concerning the Custody and Access Report, a Family Justice Counsellor with the Custody and Access Team, Nancy Jean Mussellam, began interviewing the parties. She observed V. with each of his parents in their respective homes, and interviewed third parties to obtain collateral information. Ms. Mussellam completed her first Custody and Access Report on February 15, 2010.

[69] In the section of her report entitled “Summary and Recommendations”, Ms. Mussellam wrote the following:

[Mr. T.] and [Ms. D.] are both very committed to V. and each provides enriching experiences for him. V. is an articulate and bright toddler who is benefitting from the influence of both parents’ nurturing and involvement. [Mr. T.] wants to be a caregiver to V. and to have a more significant parental role. [Ms. D.] has trepidation about V. being overnight with [Mr. T.] due to her perception that [Mr. T.] will not be able to adequately nurture V. Further, it is her belief [Mr. T.] does not keep V.’s best interests in focus. She acknowledged, however, that overnights are soon likely to occur.

[Mr. T.] and [Ms. D.]’s different parenting beliefs and styles have caused a great deal of tension between them. [Mr. T.] appears spontaneous and provides balance to [Ms. D.]’s well-motivated yet more protective ways. [Ms. D.] is resistant to let go of V.’s care, however with time and gradual change, hopefully [Mr. T.] can take a larger role and more responsibility for V. For [Mr. T.] to become a caregiver, he needs the opportunity to participate in V.’s overall care, including how to nurture him overnight. V. clearly has strong connections to both parents and he needs to feel that both parents are unified in his presence. With the support and commitment of both parents through this transition, the potential exists for trust to be established.

[70] At the time the report was written, Mr. T. had access visits with V. for two to three hours most weekdays, and from 10:30 to 6:00 on Sundays. Ms. D did not yet agree to overnight access, which continued to be a matter of significant contention.

[71] Among other things, the writer recommended that V. have two overnight visits per week with Mr. T. The recommendation was as follows:

The current arrangement has frequent transitions and V. would be better served with more stability. I recommend that [Ms. D.] retain primary residence of V. and that V. begin a transition to overnight visits with [Mr. T.]. I recommend that [Mr. T.] have V. on Sunday at 10:00 a.m. until Monday at 12:00 noon and on Thursdays at 10:00 a.m. until Friday at noon. This plan could be expanded as V. grows and feels secure with staying for longer periods at his dad’s.

[72] Ms. D. did not accept the recommendations. She was of the view that V. would have difficulty coping with overnights, and the Mr. T. could not properly care for V. A hearing date was set to determine the access schedule.

[73] On the day of the hearing, Ms. D. agreed to the recommendations. V. had his first overnight visit with his father in April 2010. Although Ms. D. was of the view that

V. was usually exhausted after his overnights with Mr. T. and arrived home in a hyperactive state, the evidence as a whole supports the conclusion that V. settled in well to the overnight access regimen.

[74] In accordance with the recommendations of Ms. Mussellam, Mr. T. attended several workshops on parenting.

[75] In July 2010 Mr. T. asked for more extended overnight access. Ms. D. refused. In August, the parties agreed to ask Ms. Mussellam for an updated Custody and Access Report. Ms. Mussellam once again conducted meetings and interviews, and published the updated report on February 22, 2011.

[76] In her report, Ms. Mussellam observed that while V. had adjusted well to the new access regimen, the parents continued to struggle with their co-parenting relationship. Mr. T. told Ms. Mussellam that he wanted more time with V. and better opportunities to be fully involved as a parent. It was his perspective that Ms. D. was attempting to preclude any sort of equitable parenting arrangement. Ms. D.'s perspective, as she reported it, was that V. had only recently adjusted to the current access regimen. It was her belief that Mr. T. did not focus sufficiently on V.'s physical, emotional and psychological well-being.

[77] Ms. Mussellam reported the following with respect to the parties' different parenting styles:

In home visits and observations at each home, it was clear each parent has a different parenting style and communication style with V. [Ms. D.]'s role was clearly a parenting role where she set clear boundaries and expectations about V.'s behavior. [Mr. T.] focussed more on play and spontaneity, creating an environment where V. was making choices about what would happen next.

... During my time there, there was spontaneous affection between V. and [Mr. T.], with V. often climbing into his dad's arms and hugging him. It was a close and loving relationship.

[78] The differing strengths and weaknesses of each parent was summarized in the report as follows:

[Mr. T.] is a nurturing and capable parent to V. [Mr. T.] is spontaneous and creative in his behavior with V. and he is able to take care of V.'s needs. ... [Mr. T.] could use some education around developmental stages and the importance of routines. To have more parenting time would necessitate that [Mr. T.] be cognizant of regular mealtimes and bedtime. This will only develop if [Mr. T.] is given more of an extended opportunity to be a parent.

[Ms. D.] is a responsible and loving parent who strives to protect V.'s well-being. She provides structure and boundaries for V. effectively. She tends to be hyper-vigilant as a response to what she sees as [Mr. T.]'s inability to adequately care for V. and respond to his needs.

[79] Ms. Mussellam summarized her observations as follows:

[Mr. T.] and [Ms. D.] are well-intentioned and loving parents. Both want the best for V. as demonstrated by their strong commitment and unwavering desire to do what is best. V. is a bright and healthy little boy. He needs to be freed of the anxiety that arises from his parents' ongoing power struggle. V. needs to feel the freedom to love and spend time with both parents, including extended family on both sides.

V. can benefit from two styles of parenting, as long as both parents support the other in V.'s presence and allow V. to value both. [Ms. D.] and [Mr. T.] provide balance because of [Ms. D.]'s structured and consistent routine for V. and [Mr. T.]'s creative and spontaneous style. It would help V. if [Ms. D.] could focus [on] the positive aspects of V.'s time with his father and with gradual steps, expanding and allowing [Mr. T.] more time with V. With support, [Mr. T.] can develop a consistent and appropriate routine in his home related to meals and bedtime, especially as V. prepares for the [consistency] and routine of attending school.

It would be helpful if [Mr. T.] could expand his knowledge and parenting skills through parenting courses and child development education. This will assist him to understand important aspects of child development related to consistency and routine. [Ms. D.] needs to recognize the positive aspects of V.'s exposure to different experiences through his father, and the potential for V. to be enriched by increased involvement with him.

[80] In the result, Ms. Mussellam recommended an expansion of Mr. T.'s parenting time to an alternating two-week schedule of three days one week and four days the next. Specifically, she recommended that Mr. T. have V. from Thursday after school to Sunday at 4 p.m. the first week, and from Thursday after school until Saturday at noon the second week.

[81] The report also included recommendations that summer vacations, spring break and Christmas holidays be shared. Further, the report recommended that travel to Ontario (where Ms. D.'s extended family resides) and Vancouver Island

(where Mr. T.'s extended family resides) be encouraged "to allow V. the involvement of his extended family". Finally, Ms. Mussellam recommended the following:

If the parents remain in nearby geographical locations, and as V. gets further along in elementary school, consideration of a schedule where each parent has a greater stretch of the week and alternate weekends could be explored.

[82] By the time the updated Custody and Access Report was issued, V. was approaching his fifth birthday.

[83] Ms. D. did not accept Ms. Mussellam's recommendations and refused to permit any changes to the access schedule.

[84] Access was not the only matter of contention. The parties continued to disagree on the issue of immunization for V. Mr. T. arranged a meeting for himself and Ms. D. with Dr. Simon Dobson, a pediatrician at B.C. Children's Hospital with extensive experience in pediatric immunization. Ms. D. asked Dr. Dobson whether he could guarantee that V. would not suffer any adverse reaction to the pediatric vaccinations given as part of the immunization program at the hospital. Dr. Dobson advised that no physician could give such a guarantee. Accordingly, Ms. D. refused to consider having V. vaccinated against any of the common childhood infectious diseases.

[85] In May 2011, Mr. T. filed an application in this Court seeking, among other things, implementation of the access recommendations of Ms. Mussellam and authority to make decisions concerning V.'s health care. The application was heard in June 2011 by Madam Justice Holmes who ordered, among other things, that the access recommendations be implemented forthwith on an interim basis pending trial, and that all other issues concerning custody and guardianship be addressed at trial. She also ordered that the parties seek a medical opinion concerning the issue of V.'s immunization and, if necessary, address that issue at trial as well.

[86] The access schedule recommended by Ms. Mussellam has been in place since the June 2011 order. Mr. T. has routinely had the care of V. from Thursday after school to Sunday at 4 p.m. the first week, and from Thursday after school until Saturday at noon the second week.

[87] Although there was an initial disagreement between the parties concerning the choice of kindergarten/elementary school for V., they eventually agreed that V. should be enrolled in French Immersion at Trafalgar Elementary School. The school is located approximately half way between the residences of Ms. D. and Mr. T.

The Evidence concerning the Question of Immunization

[88] Mr. T. sought the opinion of Dr. David Scheifele, a Professor of Pediatric Medicine at the University of British Columbia and practicing physician at B.C. Children's Hospital. Dr. Scheifele is recognized as a leading expert in pediatric infectious diseases and immunization. He was appointed to the Sauder Family Chair in Pediatric Infectious Diseases (UBC) in 1995. He was the founding chair of the Canadian Association for Immunization Research and Evaluation in 2000.

[89] Dr. Scheifele has had a career-long special interest in vaccines and immunization. He chaired the Infectious Diseases and Immunization Committee of the Canadian Paediatric Society from 1981 to 1988. He chaired the National Advisory Committee on Immunization from 1993 to 1997, having previously served for 10 years as a committee member. He was the principal author of the 1998 edition of the Canadian Immunization Guide. Since 1988 he has been the director of the Vaccine Evaluation Center (VEC) at B.C. Children's Hospital. The VEC was the first academic vaccine testing centre in Canada and remains one of the country's largest and most active centres. He has been involved in over 200 vaccine-related studies and publications.

[90] Dr. Scheifele has a particular interest in vaccine safety. In 1992 he helped establish a nationwide surveillance network among twelve pediatric centres known as the Canadian Immunization Monitoring Program, Active (IMPACT). This program is federally funded and managed by the Canadian Paediatric Society. The purpose of the program is to identify children hospitalized with adverse events following immunization or with potentially vaccine-preventable infections. He has overseen the data centre for this program for the past 20 years and has co-authored a number of reports on vaccine safety. He has given dozens of lectures on childhood immunization at local and national conferences. He served as the Distinguished Lecturer at the 2010 Canadian Immunization Conference.

[91] A familiar task for Dr. Scheifele is the evaluation of children prior to vaccination. He is frequently asked to advise about vaccinations for children with unusual conditions such as possible allergies or previous adverse reactions following vaccination.

[92] Dr. Scheifele examined V. at B.C. Children's Hospital on September 22, 2011. He reviewed V.'s medical history along with that of Mr. T., who accompanied V. at the appointment.

[93] Dr. Scheifele met separately with Ms. D. on October 21, 2011, to obtain from her a detailed personal and family medical history and to conduct an additional review of V.'s medical history. Ms. D. told Dr. Scheifele of her opposition to V.'s immunization, which has two bases. First, Ms. D. suffered significant adverse reactions after receiving several vaccinations as a child, including high fevers and seizures, and other members of her family have suffered similar reactions. Second, she has great concern that the aluminum adjuvant present in some childhood vaccines is unsafe for children. She has read, for example, that aluminum adjuvants can cause neurological disorders such as autism.

[94] Dr. Scheifele prepared a written opinion for the Court concerning the question of the risks and benefits of V.'s immunization. He also addressed the question of the benefits and risks of childhood immunization generally, and the risks facing an unvaccinated child in Vancouver. Dr. Scheifele was called as a witness by Mr. T. to speak to his qualifications and opinion, and to answer questions in cross-examination by Ms. D.

[95] In response to Ms. D.'s questioning, Dr. Scheifele explained that aluminum adjuvants are important components of some vaccines because they enhance the immune response to the vaccine. He noted that researchers at the United States Food and Drug Administration recently modelled carefully the amounts of aluminum in infants after infant vaccinations using the best available human data. They found that the amount of aluminum in infants' bodies from vaccines and diet was significantly less than the levels determined to be safe. The researchers concluded that episodic exposures to vaccines containing aluminum adjuvants continue to present an extremely low risk to infants, and that the benefits of using those vaccines outweighed any theoretical risks.

[96] Ms. D. asked Dr. Scheifele whether he could guarantee that V. would not suffer any adverse reaction to any of the vaccinations recommended for children. Dr. Scheifele was clear in his response: medical science can never offer such a guarantee. He reiterated his opinion that the risk of V. suffering an adverse reaction is extremely low, and the benefits to V. of receiving the vaccinations significantly outweighed the theoretical risks.

[97] Addressing Ms. D.'s concern that vaccinations may cause autism, Dr. Scheifele said that studies have convincingly shown that autism does not result from immunization. In any event, autism becomes evident during early childhood; this is no longer a concern for V., who is developmentally normal.

[98] Dr. Scheifele also addressed Ms. D.'s concerns about the fevers and seizures she and her siblings suffered following vaccinations as children. He said the following:

The "baby shot" formulation used at that time contained the first generation pertussis vaccine which consisted of whole, killed organisms. About 50% of children had fever shortly after this vaccination so such a history is not surprising. Since 1992 Canada has used a second generation (acellular) pertussis vaccine as part of the "baby shot," which causes fever in fewer children (15%), with less likelihood of high fever [less than 5%]. Thus V. is unlikely to react to the modern vaccine as his mother and her siblings did to the older vaccine.

... [T]he first generation pertussis vaccine sometimes caused high fever, sufficient to trigger convulsions in seizure-prone individuals. Children can be seizure-prone from a variety of causes but the most common is “benign familial febrile convulsions.” This condition occurs in about 5% of the population and is expressed only during early childhood, triggered by fever. The condition is outgrown by mid-childhood and does not progress to epilepsy or result in neuro-developmental impairment ... Parent to child inheritance of this trait does occur but is expressed in a minority of offspring.

[99] Dr. Scheifele pointed out that at the age of 5, V. has passed beyond the peak risk period for benign febrile convulsions without showing any indication of proneness to seizures. The colds, ear infections and cough illnesses he had already experienced did not trigger seizures, thus it was unlikely that vaccination-related fevers would do so. Dr. Scheifele went on to say that in the largest study to date (Huang WT et al., Pediatrics 2010), no increased risk of febrile seizures was detected after immunization with modern pertussis vaccines administered to young children. Further:

The increased risk of febrile seizures after measles-mumps-rubella vaccine given during the second year of life was estimated to be between 2.5 and 3.4 per 10,000 children ... The risk with first doses of measles-containing vaccine given at 5 years of age has not been measured but will be lower than in infancy because of 90% of children have outgrown their proneness to febrile convulsions by this age ...

[100] After reviewing all of the information provided to him by Ms. D. and Mr. T., Dr. Scheifele stated that he would not hesitate to immunize V., who is a normal, healthy child. According to Dr. Scheifele, nothing in V.’s personal or family history poses a contraindication to routine childhood immunizations or presents any greater risk than that faced by other healthy children. In fact, the risk of giving vaccines at V.’s age -- 5 years -- is lower than with vaccinations in the first two years of life.

[101] Dr. Scheifele is of the opinion that there are certain risks facing an unvaccinated child in Vancouver. On that issue, he stated the following:

Unimmunized children, as with V., typically avoid vaccine-preventable infections like measles and whooping cough because most children around them in school or in the community are immune following immunization. With high levels of population protection, contagious diseases cannot readily circulate. However, this so-called herd immunity or indirect protection has limits. A study in Colorado, where childhood immunization rates resembled those in BC, showed that unimmunized children were 22 times more likely than immunized children to develop measles and 6 times more likely to develop pertussis/whooping cough ... Such observations reflect the highly contagious nature of common childhood infections. If overall vaccination rates slip, infections previously held at bay can return to cause outbreaks among susceptible children and adults. Given that childhood vaccination rates in BC are suboptimal (70%-80%), one can predict that periodic outbreaks of some vaccine-preventable infections will occur and could involve V. If he is an adolescent at the time, the course of measles or chickenpox illness is likely to be more severe than in infancy, with greater risk of complications and hospitalization. Travel can also increase risk of exposure. V.'s mother spoke of possibly travelling with him to California, likely unaware that the state is experiencing the largest epidemic of pertussis since 1958, with over 9,000 cases in 2010 and over 2,000 cases in 2011. Under-immunized children were contributors to the situation.

[102] Dr. Scheifele addressed in his opinion the risks of each vaccine-preventable infectious disease against which children in British Columbia are routinely vaccinated. There are 14 such diseases. Six of them -- tetanus, diphtheria, pertussis (commonly known as whooping cough), polio, haemophilus influenzae b invasive infections (such as meningitis) and hepatitis B -- are included in a "six-in-one" vaccine given to infants. Meningococcal C and pneumococcal 13-valent vaccines are also given to infants. Measles, mumps, rubella and chickenpox vaccines are given in the second year of life. Apart from booster doses, adolescents are offered hepatitis B vaccine (if not previously given), human papillomavirus vaccine (administered to girls only) and 4-valent meningococcal vaccine. Young children are also offered influenza vaccine.

[103] It is Dr. Scheifele's opinion that none of the vaccinations given for these 14 infectious diseases poses any greater risk of significant adverse effects to V. than to any other child his age. All of the vaccines are well-tolerated by children. Most importantly, it is his view that the benefits of securing V.'s protection from each of the 14 diseases far outweigh the limited risks of vaccine side effects.

[104] Dr. Scheifele observed that the actual immunization schedule for children starting at V.'s age is shorter than the early childhood schedule because of maturation of immune responsiveness. Waiting until a local outbreak occurs to immunize him is not ideal because protective responses take weeks (as with measles) or months (as with pertussis) to develop, during which time risk of exposure continues. Further, as V. lives in Vancouver, some thought must be given to earthquake preparedness. An unimmunized person who is injured in such circumstances is at serious risk because tetanus prevention may not be available during disruptions of health care and transportation.

[105] Ms. D. sought the opinion of Christopher Shaw, Ph.D., a neurobiology researcher and Professor in the Department of Ophthalmology at UBC. Mr. Shaw is not a medical doctor and has no expertise in pediatric infectious diseases or pediatric immunization. His research area is neurological disorders such as ALS and Parkinson's.

[106] Mr. Shaw has recently become interested in examining the question of whether adverse reactions, including possible neurological disabilities, can be caused by aluminum adjuvants in vaccines. He has published articles in which he advances the hypothesis that aluminum adjuvants contained in vaccines are neurotoxins which possibly contribute to autism in children.

[107] Ms. D. called Mr. Shaw as a witness and sought to file two reports authored by him. The first was a one-page report in which he expressed certain views concerning the question of whether V. should be vaccinated. The second was advanced as a rebuttal to Dr. Scheifele's report. Upon an initial review of Mr. Shaw's curriculum vitae and after hearing his evidence on the voir dire concerning his educational background and work experience, I advised Ms. D. that I had significant doubts as to Mr. Shaw's qualifications to express an opinion on issues concerning pediatric infectious diseases and immunization. I was also doubtful, even if Mr. Shaw was properly qualified, that the second report was proper rebuttal. I allowed Ms. D. to file the reports with the proviso that after reviewing Mr. Shaw's curriculum vitae in detail, I may ultimately rule either that he was not qualified to express the opinions advanced or that his qualifications were such that I could give only limited weight to his opinions.

[108] I have now had an opportunity to carefully review Mr. Shaw's curriculum vitae, including the publications he listed in, and appended to, his curriculum vitae. On the basis of my review, I have concluded that Mr. Shaw is a distinguished basic research scientist in the field of neurobiology but he is not qualified to express an opinion concerning the risks and benefits of immunization from infectious diseases of children generally or V. specifically.

[109] In any event, the opinion advanced by Mr. Shaw was that "the possibility of negative consequences for V. from some combination of pediatric vaccines cannot be discounted". Dr. Scheifele's opinion, although expressed slightly differently, was similar in effect. Medical science can never rule out the possibility of an adverse reaction. However, the risk of adverse reaction is very low, and the benefits of immunization greatly outweigh the risks to children should they contract any of the infectious diseases against which the vaccinations protect.

The Parties' Parenting Abilities

[110] The s. 15 reports were filed at trial by agreement. Neither called the author of the reports.

[111] Both parties testified at length about their parenting of V. and about the challenges of shared parenting. Mr. T. was considerably more optimistic than Ms. D. about the prospects of successfully sharing the parenting of V. on an equal basis. Mr. T. pointed to the fact that the parties have managed to agree on fundamental issues such as V.'s education. While acknowledging that he is not quite as exacting as Ms. D. about V.'s dietary needs, Mr. T. said he is quite fastidious about providing V. with the healthiest of foods. Although the parties disagree on the issue of immunization, they have otherwise agreed on V.'s dental and medical care. Mr. T. is of the view that, overall, V. benefits greatly from the differing interests and parenting styles of the parties.

[112] Ms. D. does not believe the parties are capable of having equal parenting authority or that V. should spend equal time with each parent. She described the parties' relationship generally as one of high conflict. She agreed that Mr. T.'s approach to V.'s diet has improved significantly over time, but believes that he still allows V. to eat too many sugary foods. She is concerned about V.'s safety, and about his ability to obtain the necessary rest, while in Mr. T.'s care.

[113] The parties testified at length about the conflicts that arose about V.'s care during the marriage and immediately after separation. I have no doubt the conflicts were numerous and intense during those times, particularly during the time after separation when the parties were struggling with the question of Mr. T.'s overnight access to V. As time went by, Mr. T. gradually gained more access, and that access gave him the opportunity to experience parenting of V. and learn from that experience. Unfortunately, Ms. D. continued to hold the firm belief that Mr. T. was not capable of properly parenting V., and the conflict continued.

[114] The parties required s. 15 reports and numerous applications to court in order to achieve a more equitable parenting arrangement. However, I infer from the evidence as a whole that once the shared parenting regime was finally settled, and Ms. D. came to realize that V.'s health and safety was not threatened (or even compromised), the conflict lessened significantly.

[115] Both parties led evidence from third parties, who testified to their observations of the parties' parenting of V.

[116] The evidence advanced by Ms. D. focussed, in the main, on the period of time during and shortly after the marriage. She led evidence from her sister, who helped care for V. during the marriage and immediately following the parties' separation. She testified that during the marriage, Mr. T. was resentful of her participation in V.'s care and her presence in the family residence generally. She described Mr. T. as short-tempered, impulsive and self-indulgent. Ms. D.'s sister was critical of Mr. T.'s parenting abilities as she observed them during the marriage and immediately after the parties separated, but gave no evidence about Mr. T.'s current parenting.

[117] Ms. D. also led evidence from V.'s preschool teacher, an employee at Dunbar Community Centre, who attested to Ms. D.'s devotion to V. and her outstanding qualities as a parent. She observed that immediately following the parties' separation, V. appeared to be having a difficult time adjusting. He seemed more unsettled and excitable when he arrived at preschool after having spent an overnight with Mr. T. She thought V. played more roughly and engaged in imaginary gun play after being with Mr. T.

[118] The preschool teacher testified that she was uncomfortable with Mr. T.'s behavior on several occasions when he dropped V. off at the community centre. She said that Mr. T., instead of leaving or simply observing, would get down on the floor and climb around with the children in their play house. She found this disruptive and upsetting to some of the other parents. The preschool teacher also testified to two incidents shortly after the parties' separation where Mr. T. displayed angry behavior toward Ms. D. in the presence of V. and others in the community centre lobby.

[119] Despite her misgivings about Mr. T.'s play with the children, the preschool teacher at no time addressed those misgivings with Mr. T. She acknowledged that Mr. T. routinely asked about V.'s progress and well-being, and that although they spoke at the beginning of every class she did not tell Mr. T. that he should not play with the children. She said she was not comfortable raising her concerns with Mr. T.

[120] The preschool teacher did not make any observations about Mr. T.'s interactions with V.

[121] In response to a question from the Court about V.'s current functioning, the preschool teacher said that V. now appeared to be a "fairly typical five-year-old boy".

[122] Mr. T. called evidence from four witnesses who have spent time with him and V. All attested to Mr. T.'s devotion to V. and his strong parenting abilities. One witness, the father of a girl who is approximately the same age as V., testified that he and Mr. T. often took their children on outings together. He observed that Mr. T. was always meticulous about matters such as the children's safety and nutrition. He never hesitates to send his daughter with Mr. T. and V. on boating, hiking and camping trips, often for quite extensive periods of time.

[123] Another witness, to whom I will refer as Ms. M., is the mother of two boys, one of whom was slightly older than V. and the other somewhat younger. She has known both Ms. D. and Mr. T. for many years. Ms. M. testified that during the parties' marriage, her friendship was primarily with Ms. D. She observed that before the parties separated, Mr. T. habitually deferred to Ms. D. in matters concerning V., and abdicated most parenting responsibilities to her. However, over the past three years she has observed -- with some surprise -- a remarkable evolution in Mr. T.'s parenting. She said she considered herself to be a thoughtful and attentive parent, but that Mr. T. has gradually become an even better parent. Ms. M. described Mr. T. as vigilant about V.'s safety in his sports activities. She said Mr. T. ensures that V. eats healthy foods and encourages him to make healthy choices. According to Ms. M., Mr. T. displays patience with his son which exceeds that of most parents she knows (including herself).

[124] Ms. M. described both parties as exceptional parents who are equally capable of providing excellent care to V.

[125] A third witness called by Mr. T. has known Mr. T. for many years through the theatre community and has spent significant amounts of time in the company of Mr. T. and V. He testified that Mr. T. fostered V.'s interest and participation in the arts. Mr. T. takes V. to art classes, plays, museums and galleries. He engages in art projects with V. This witness, too, said that he had observed Mr. T. evolve over time into a parent who is engaged in every aspect of his son's life and is dedicated to his well-being.

[126] The witnesses called by Mr. T. attested to the fact that while in their presence, Mr. T. spoke to V. about his mother only in positive terms and appeared to respect and encourage V.'s relationship with Ms. D.

Family Assets and Debts

[127] As noted earlier, the parties kept their finances separate throughout their brief marriage. They had no shared bank accounts or common credit cards. As Mr. T. put it, the parties “lived like islands” during the marriage. Any income the parties earned, they placed in their respective bank accounts. They did not exchange any information about their respective finances.

[128] One of the few significant assets of Mr. T. was the bare lot located near Pender Harbour on the Sunshine Coast as payment for work he performed for a developer over a period of about three years. He performed a considerable amount of the work in the first five months of the marriage. Mr. T. and the developer agreed the lot was worth $100,000 at the time. The parties visited the lot briefly two or three times during the marriage, but did not use the property or make improvements to it.

[129] Both parties filed reports concerning the value of the lot. The lot has recently been assessed by the municipality at $140,000 for municipal tax purposes. The report filed by Mr. T. indicated a value of $95,000 in 2011 but a slight reduction in value by 2012. The report filed by Ms. D. set the value at $125,000. Mr. T. obtained a $50,000 mortgage on the property during the marriage to pay family expenses and contribute for several months to the mortgage on the condominium. He obtained another $10,000 loan against the property following the parties’ separation in order to pay lawyers’ fees related to this litigation.

[130] Mr. T. has owned a cabin on Cypress (Hollyburn) Mountain for approximately twenty years. He purchased it for $14,000. The cabin, which is very rustic, is situated on leased land. For municipal property tax purposes, the cabin was recently valued at approximately $39,000. The parties did not use it for recreational purposes or make any improvements to it. Ms. D. visited the property about a half dozen times during the marriage.

[131] The only other asset acquired during the marriage was the condominium. As noted earlier, the condominium was sold in 2009 after the parties separated. The net proceeds of sale were in the amount of $17,500. Ms. D. received $7,000 by court order following separation. The remaining funds are in a solicitor's trust account.

[132] The parties went into the marriage only with their respective savings. Ms. D. had approximately $90,000 in savings as a result of the sale at the time of the marriage of her apartment on East 8th. Mr. T. received a $25,000 payment from a client for some graphic art work he completed at about the time the parties married. He gave the cheque to Ms. D., who cashed it and put the funds in a safe in the apartment; she disbursed the money over time to meet family expenses. Ms. D. had credit cards with several financial institutions and used them extensively. Mr. T. paid for family items with cash he earned from his projects.

[133] During the marriage, Mr. T. received a monthly draw from a family trust fund in the amount of $390 per month. The trust was established from the estate of Mr. T.'s grandfather for several members of the family, including Mr. T.'s father and sister. The monthly payments received by the various family members consist of both interest and capital from the trust fund; accordingly, the payments are diminishing over time and will cease within a few years. Mr. T. currently receives $275 per month from the trust.

[134] Ms. D. was the designated recipient of the monthly allowance cheque to which the family was entitled after V.'s birth. Mr. T. acknowledged that for the first six months after the family began receiving the payments, he took the cheques from the family mailbox without Ms. D.'s knowledge. He opened a Registered Education Savings Plan in V.'s name and placed the monthly allowance funds, which totalled about $600, in the RESP. Ms. D. was not aware of the RESP. Mr. T. placed an additional $1,500 in the RESP which he obtained by selling company shares that he had purchased at Ms. D.'s request. Ms. D. was not aware of the sale of the shares.

[135] Ms. D.'s position at trial was that Mr. T. had fraudulently appropriated the funds, which belonged to her, and that she was entitled to repayment of the $2,100. She argued in the alternative that she should be given signing authority over the RESP.

[136] The parties were involved in two small ventures during the marriage. The first involved the harvesting of kelp from beaches on the west coast of Vancouver Island to sell as garden fertilizer. In the summer of 2007, Mr. T. spent five weeks near Sooke, B.C. trying to develop a method for the collection and sale of kelp. He had received $15,000 for a carpentry job, which he used to take the time off from work and continue to pay family expenses. Ms. D. contributed approximately $3,200 to the venture, which she viewed as a loan to Mr. T. Mr. T. agreed that he understood the money advanced by Ms. D. to be a loan. He used $2,200 to purchase a truck and camper for living accommodations and $1,000 to purchase a skiff to collect the kelp.

[137] Mr. T. paid two graphic artists a total of $5,000 to help him market the kelp once it was a product capable of sale as fertilizer. However, nothing came of the venture.

[138] Ms. D. sought repayment of the $3,200. She also argued that she was entitled to half the current value of the skiff and the truck and camper unit. Mr. T. testified that the skiff and the camper are both sitting in a field exposed to the elements. He described them as rusted and useless. The evidence concerning the truck was not clear. It seems that the truck was over twenty years old when purchased and was, even then, of nominal value. It is no longer operational.

[139] The second venture involved the making of lip balm with a view to marketing it commercially. The idea grew from a recipe Ms. D. used to make homemade lip balm for the family. A significant ingredient of the lip balm was beeswax. As part of the venture, the parties purchased a large quantity of beeswax for $15,000. The lip balm was never made, but the beeswax is in storage with Mr. T. The parties agree the beeswax has retained its value and could be easily sold.

[140] Mr. T. owned a Volkswagen van at the time of the marriage. The parties used the van during the marriage for transportation and camping. After the parties separated, Mr. T. sold the van for $8,900 and kept the proceeds of the sale.

[141] Ms. D. incurred significant credit card debt during the marriage. She provided the statements of account for each of the credit cards. The total debt is approximately $75,000, which Ms. D. says was incurred on behalf of the family. Accordingly, she seeks reimbursement from Mr. T. for half the indebtedness.

[142] I have reviewed the voluminous credit card statements produced by Ms. D., who filed them as exhibits at trial. She provided very little evidence concerning the hundreds of transactions reflected in the statements. It is apparent that a significant portion of the credit card debt relates to costs incurred during the renovation of the condominium described earlier in these reasons. Ms. D. also used the credit cards to fund projects unrelated to the family, such as her sister's attendance at acting classes. It is evident that Ms. D. was spending far more money each month than the parties were earning. It was not unusual for Ms. D. to make purchases of $8,000 to $10,000 per month on credit.

[143] Mr. T. did not receive copies of the credit card statements during the marriage. Ms. D. did not dispute Mr. T.'s assertion that he was not consulted about the expenditures and was unaware of the majority of them. I accept that Mr. T. was not aware of the extent to which Ms. D. was spending beyond the parties' means. As I noted earlier, the parties had an informal arrangement whereby Mr. T. paid the rent and utility costs while Ms. D. paid for groceries and day-to-day household supplies, but they did not otherwise pool their resources or share information about their finances.

III. DECISION AND ORDERS

A. Custody/Residency of V.

[144] The Divorce Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 3 (2nd Supp.) directs the Court to consider only the best interests of the child when determining the issue of custody. Section 16(8) stipulates the following:

In making an order under this section, the court shall take into consideration only the best interests of the child of the marriage as determined by reference to the condition, means, needs and other circumstances of the child.

[145] The Court cannot take past conduct of a person into consideration when making a custody order unless the conduct is relevant to the person's ability to act as a parent of a child: s. 16(9).

[146] Further, when making a custody order, the Court must give effect to the principle that a child should have as much contact with each parent as is consistent with the child's best interests, and must take into consideration the willingness of each parent to facilitate contact with the child: s. 16(10).

[147] Section 24 of the Family Relations Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 128 echoes these principles. It describes additional factors the Court ought to consider when determining the child's best interests, including (i) the health and emotional well-being of the child; (ii) the love, affection and other ties that exist between the child and other persons; and (iii) the child's education and training.

[148] I do not accept Ms. D.'s argument that the previous conflict between the parties precludes an order for joint custody of V. and shared access on an equitable basis. Both parties contributed to the conflict. Ms. D. refused to accept the reality that V. has two parents. She mistakenly assumed that because Mr. T. abdicated parenting responsibility during the marriage (which I conclude he did at least in part because Ms. D. would not allow him to be involved in V.'s care in a significant way) that he would accept a minor role in V.'s life once the parties separated. Mr. T. often acted in an immature and impulsive way. On some of those occasions, he was reacting to Ms. D.'s need to control every aspect of V.'s care.

[149] Each of the parties gave evidence over several days. I am satisfied, having listened to their evidence, that neither understood the eccentricities of the other when they decided to marry. Their differences were only accentuated once V. was born and they attempted to parent him. They shared little common ground concerning V.'s care. Mr. T. reacted to Ms. D.'s cautious and structured approach to V.'s activities and care by being more adventurous and unstructured. Ms. D. viewed Mr. T. as reckless; Mr. T. viewed Ms. D. as smothering.

[150] Ms. D.'s refusal to give Mr. T. overnight access to V. was shortsighted and ill-advised, as was Mr. T.'s decision to bring the ex parte application against Ms. D. Their actions set up a recurring cycle of unfortunate reactions which continued well into the second year of the parties' separation.

[151] And yet, despite their differences, it is clear that both parties are devoted, loving and considered parents. Ms. Mussellam accurately described the parenting dialectic in her reports. As noted earlier in these reasons, she reported that both Mr. T. and Ms. D. were well-intentioned and loving parents who were strongly committed to do what was best for V. She also reported that V. would benefit from both of their styles of parenting, so long as the parents supported each other and allowed V. to value both.

[152] I am satisfied the evidence overwhelmingly supports the conclusion that V.'s best interests require the equal participation of both parents in his life. Both Ms. D. and Mr. T. are excellent parents. They bring different strengths to his parenting and diverse interests to his life, and for that very reason his best interests require the involvement of both.

[153] I do not share Ms. D.'s lack of optimism about the ability of the parties to share parenting of V. Her outlook has been influenced by the parties' obvious incompatibility as life partners and the corrosive effect on their relationship of the events that occurred immediately after separation. Mr. T.'s behavior toward Ms. D. has been greatly attenuated over the past year by his increased access to V. I have no doubt that Mr. T. can safely and effectively parent V., and that V.'s life would be much the poorer without his equal involvement in it.

[154] The parties, for all their differences, share a deep commitment to V.'s well-being. That commitment will enable them to share his parenting. I conclude the parties should have joint custody of V.

[155] I turn now to the access regime.

[156] V. has spent extensive periods of time with both parents. Under the current parenting regime, he spends more than half his time with his mother. As noted earlier in these reasons, he spends four days one week and three days the next with his father, and the balance of each week with his mother. There is no evidence to suggest that the increased amount of time he has spent with his father since the order of Holmes J. in June 2011 has posed a problem for him.

[157] Mr. T. now seeks to have his access to V. increased to alternating weeks. Ms. D. asks to have the current access regime maintained for a few more years.

[158] V. is approaching six years of age. He is established in elementary school. He has thrived on the access regime to date. Ms. Mussellam, the author of the s. 15 report, recognized the benefits to V. of having as much contact as possible with each parent. In my view, there is no reason to maintain an unequal access regime.

[159] V. is entitled to uninterrupted weekend time with both parents, as both Ms. D. and Mr. T. work during the week and V. attends school Monday through Friday. Not surprisingly, both parents desire the opportunity to have full weekends with their son. Further, both agree that it is in V.'s best interests to have fewer transitions between his parents' homes.

[160] For all of these reasons, I have concluded that V. should spend alternating weeks with each parent.

[161] Specifically, V. should spend the first week of every month with Ms. D., commencing Tuesday of each week. Designating Tuesday as the exchange day will preclude arguments about access during long weekends and weeks in which school is in recess due to teachers' Professional Development Days. V. will be taken to school by the parent whose access week is ending and taken home at the end of the school day by the parent whose access week is commencing.

[162] With the same considerations in mind, V. will spend an equal amount of time with his parents during summer holidays, as well as during the school spring break and Christmas break. The weekly access schedule will continue for the summer holidays, with the exception that V. is entitled to spend two uninterrupted weeks with each parent in order to accommodate his parents' vacation plans that might include travel.

[163] Neither parent will restrict the other parent from travelling outside of the Lower Mainland during their respective parenting times so long as a travel itinerary and contact information is provided. Each parent will provide the necessary written permission for travel with the other.

[164] On family occasions involving weddings, birthdays, memorial services or other such special events, V. is entitled to attend with the parent involved in the event notwithstanding the regular access schedule.

[165] The parent having access will facilitate reasonable telephone contact between V. and the other parent.

[166] I will leave to the parties the responsibility to specify pick up and drop off times when the exchange is other than during the school week, and to reach agreement on access during other special days such as Mother's and Father's Day. In the unlikely event that the parties cannot agree on such matters, they may contact me through the Registry by letter or email of no more than three paragraphs (less than one page) in length, and I will make the determination based on the written information provided by the parties. I encourage the parties to reach a consensus on these matters; I do not intend to entertain lengthy submissions on any of these issues, and will be making my decisions on a summary basis.

B. Guardianship of V.

[167] The current guardianship regime is that contained in the interim order issued by the Provincial Court in April 2009. Under that order, which is based on the "Joyce" guardianship model, the ultimate decision-making authority concerning significant matters such as V.'s health care (except decisions that must be made on an emergent basis), education, and religious instruction have been granted to Ms. D.

The parties are obligated to discuss these matters fully and reach agreement if at all possible.

[168] In fact, the parties have managed to reach agreement on most significant matters concerning V.'s welfare. The exception is health care, and, in particular, the question of V.'s immunization.

[169] I have concluded that it is in V.'s best interests to grant equal decision-making authority to both Ms. D. and Mr. T. on all significant matters concerning V.'s welfare. In the particular circumstances of this case, which I have already addressed, I am satisfied that both parents should be equally involved in these decisions. Each parent brings a particular perspective and life experience that is necessary to ensure V.'s best interests are served. If the parties cannot reach agreement on a significant issue concerning V.'s welfare, then a third party in possession of all the necessary information should make the decision.

[170] Once again, as I am familiar with the background and circumstances, I will remain seized in order to provide assistance to the parties on an expeditious basis. However, should the parties prefer, they may retain a parenting coordinator to assist them.

[171] The existing terms of the guardianship order will otherwise remain the same. To be clear (as there was some argument about this matter), there will be a term in the order to the effect that in the event of the death of either parent, the remaining parent will be the sole guardian of V.

[172] I will turn now to the contentious issue of whether V. should be immunized in accordance with the recommendations of the provincial health authorities.

[173] I have summarized in some detail the evidence provided at trial by Dr. Scheifele, both oral and written, because the issue is one of such fundamental importance to the parties. As noted earlier in these reasons, Dr. Scheifele gave evidence pursuant to the order of Madam Justice Holmes. The Court was fortunate to receive the opinion of an independent expert such as Dr. Scheifele, who is acknowledged to be one of the most knowledgeable physicians in the field of child immunology. I am satisfied that Dr. Scheifele testified as a truly independent witness with a view to providing the Court with the information necessary to make an important medical decision on V.'s behalf because his parents cannot reach agreement on the issue.

[174] Dr. Scheifele's view, based on the evidence I summarized earlier, is that the benefits of immunization to V. far outweigh any risk that may be associated with possible side effects from the immunization. While there is a risk of side effects, it is minimal. Further, most known side effects are short-lived and clinically minimal in nature. It is Dr. Scheifele's opinion that V., like all children of his age in this province, is at risk of contracting a number of the infectious diseases covered by the vaccinations particularly if he travels to other countries with his parents.

[175] Dr. Scheifele's opinion is based not only on his own clinical experience and research, as well as his review and analysis of the medical research literature worldwide, but also on his specific knowledge of the medical histories of V.'s parents (based on interviews with them) and his medical examination of V.

[176] In short, no stone has been left unturned on this issue. I accept Dr. Scheifele's opinion that the benefits of immunization to V. significantly outweigh any risk of side effects. For that reason, I conclude that Mr. T. is entitled to make the decision concerning V.'s immunization.

C. Division of Family Assets and Debts

[177] This was a three-year marriage, during which the parties accumulated little in the way of assets.

[178] Both parties have expended much of their time, energy and resources over the past three years engaged in this litigation.

[179] The assets the parties accumulated during the marriage include the condominium, the Pender Harbour property, the skiff, boat and trailer and the truck and camper. Mr. T. came into the marriage with his cabin on Cypress and a share in his family trust. There are also debts. Ms. D. left the marriage with $75,000 in credit card debt. Mr. T. obtained a $50,000 mortgage on the Pender Harbour property in order to obtain additional funds for use within the family. He also obtained an additional $10,000 to pay a small fraction of the legal bills he accumulated in the course of this litigation.

Legal principles governing apportionment

[180] The apportionment of family assets is governed by s. 65 of the Family Relations Act. Section 65 does not require the Court to award each spouse a share directly proportionate to the contribution of each spouse to the asset: Elsom v. Elsom, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1367. The Family Relations Act calls for division of family assets on a presumptively equal basis. However, s. 65(1) describes a number of factors the presence of which may render an equal division unfair:

- a) the duration of the marriage;
- b) the duration of time since separation of the parties;
- c) the date when property was acquired or disposed of;
- d) the extent to which the property was acquired by one spouse by inheritance or gift;
- e) the needs of each spouse to become or remain economically independent and self-sufficient; and
- f) any other circumstances relating to the acquisition, preservation, improvement or use of the property, or the capacity or liabilities of a spouse.

[181] Where a debt has been incurred by one spouse for use within the family unit, it is appropriate to reapportion assets to account for that debt. However, the presence of debt is only one factor to consider under s. 65: Stein v. Stein, 2008 SCC 35.

Application of the legal principles

(a) The condominium

[182] Ms. D. sought total reapportionment of the proceeds of sale from the condominium. In the event that the proceeds are divided equally, she seeks to have Mr. T. pay a proportionate amount of the debt she incurred to renovate the property.

[183] Ms. D. initially purchased the condominium for the family home. She used some of the funds she brought into the marriage to finance the down payment and pay for renovations. From my review of her credit card statements, I conclude that a significant portion of the credit card debt she was left with at the time of the parties' separation was the result of using credit to complete the renovations.

[184] Mr. T. contributed several months of mortgage and strata fees, which were $3,000 per month. Ms. D. otherwise made those payments for over a year. Ms. D.'s sister lived in the condominium for a few months while it was being renovated. By the time the renovations were completed, the marriage had broken down. Ms. D. lived there for some months with V. after the parties separated, and then put the property on the market. Ms. D. received $7,000 from the net proceeds of sale by court order during the litigation. The remaining $10,500 of the net proceeds was placed in counsel's trust account and has remained there.

[185] On the basis of considerations relevant to decisions concerning apportionment of the assets and debts as a whole (which decisions follow), I have concluded that the proceeds of sale from the condominium -- that is, the $17,500 -- should be reapportioned entirely to Ms. D.

[186] Accordingly, Ms. D. is entitled to receive the funds currently held in trust. As a result however (and as Ms. D. acknowledged in argument), she is also responsible for the debt incurred to renovate the condominium. I will address the matter of the family's indebtedness in more detail in due course.

(b) The Pender Harbour property

[187] Mr. T. obtained the Pender Harbour property a few months after the parties were married, as payment for work he had over a period of approximately two years before the marriage and, more intensively, for five or six months after the marriage. The most recent property assessment, for municipal taxation purposes, valued the property at $140,000. Neither valuation obtained by the parties was that high. The assessment filed by an assessor retained by Mr. T. placed the property at a value of $95,000 in 2011, with a decrease in value to $85,000 in early 2012. Ms. D. obtained a Comparative Market Analysis which indicated a range of $97,000 to $150,000, and recommended a sale price of $125,000.

[188] Based on the municipal assessment and the information contained in the valuations obtained by the parties, I have concluded that the property should be valued for purposes of this action at $110,000. The property is currently encumbered by the $50,000 mortgage taken by Mr. T. during the marriage and the $10,000 mortgage taken subsequently to pay for legal bills.

[189] The parties visited the property on a couple of occasions to view it during the marriage, but did not use it or improve it. However, it was acquired during the marriage and at least in part as payment for Mr. T.'s work during the marriage. In my view, it is a family asset.

[190] For purposes of division of property under the Family Relations Act, the $50,000 is properly taken into account when determining the net value of the property for apportionment purposes but the $10,000 encumbrance is not. For purposes of apportionment, the property's equity is in the amount of $60,000.

[191] When determining apportionment of the property, I have taken into account the factors enumerated in s. 65(1) of the Family Relations Act, including the length of the marriage, and the date on which the property was acquired and the circumstances underlying its acquisition. I have also taken into account apportionment of the remaining assets, which I will address in due course. Finally, I have taken into account the family debt, which I will address in due course. On those bases, I conclude that the parties are entitled to an equal division of the property.

[192] Mr. T. may elect to buy out Ms. D.'s 50% interest for $30,000 and retain responsibility for the mortgages. Should he elect not to buy out Ms. D.'s interest, he will take all necessary steps to place the property in both the parties' names as tenants in common. In that case, the parties will bear equally the cost of the $50,000 mortgage, and Mr. T. will bear entirely the cost of the $10,000 mortgage.

(c) Mr. T.'s entitlement under the family trust

[193] Mr. T. inherited his share in the family trust. In light of the brief duration of the marriage, and the fact of inheritance, as well as the reapportionments described above, I have concluded that Mr. T. is entitled to reapportionment of his entire share in the family trust.

(d) The Beeswax

[194] The parties purchased a large amount of beeswax during the marriage for their lip balm venture at a cost of $15,000. The beeswax was never used. Mr. T. is currently storing the product. The parties agreed that it has likely maintained its value and that it is a marketable commodity. I conclude that the parties ought to share equally the proceeds of the sale of the beeswax. Ms. D. has the option of conducting the sale. In the event that she does not wish to do so, Mr. T. will be responsible for the sale.

(e) The Volkswagen Van

[195] Mr. T. owned the Volkswagen van for several years before the parties married. It was used by the family during the marriage. Mr. T. sold it for $8,900 following the parties' separation. While the evidence was not clear, it appears Mr. T. then purchased a truck which is now valued at $3,000.

[196] Ms. D. has retained the Ford Taurus she used during the marriage.

[197] In my view, fairness dictates that the parties retain their respective vehicles. Mr. T. is entitled to retain the proceeds of sale from the Volkswagen van.

(f) The Cypress Cabin

[198] The cabin sits on leased land. It is very rustic. Mr. T. purchased it for $14,000 in 1994. Recently the cabin was assessed at $39,000 for municipal tax purposes, but there was no evidence concerning its resale value, if any. The parties visited the cabin four or five times during the marriage. They did not make any improvements to it or otherwise expend any funds on it. I conclude that the cabin should be reapportioned entirely to Mr. T.

(g) The Skiff and Truck/Camper

[199] There was no evidence concerning the present value of these assets, which were purchased for $3,200 in 2007. They were purchased, already used, to advance the failed kelp venture. The truck was over twenty years old at the time. Mr. T.'s evidence, which I accept, is that the truck is not functional and the camper and skiff are rusting in a field. I attribute no value to these assets.

(h) Ms. D.'s Credit Card Debt

[200] At the time of separation, Ms. D. had accumulated $75,000 in credit card debt. As noted earlier, much of that debt is attributable to the renovation of the condominium. Other expenditures, such as the tuition for her sister's enrolment in acting classes, were not properly included as family debt. Ms. D. made no submissions concerning any of the expenditures.

[201] I have reviewed all of the credit card statements. On the basis of that review, I conclude that $25,000 is attributable to family-related expenditures such as food, clothing and household necessities. Accordingly, Mr. T.'s share of the family debt is $12,500.

[202] However, I have taken the $12,500 owed by Mr. T. for the family debt into account when concluding that Ms. D. is entitled to a 50% interest in the Pender Harbour Property. Accordingly, Mr. T. is not required to remit payment of any of this amount to Ms. D.

D. Child Support

[203] This was a marriage of three years' duration. Both parties were well into their adult lives when they married. Both had established careers and have continued to work in their chosen fields of work. Each brought some minimal assets and/or cash into the marriage.

[204] Ms. D. has a degree in architecture and has become a highly-regarded exhibit designer. Currently, she has chosen to establish a small private practice with a few other architects/exhibit designers. She earned no income for approximately a year following V.'s birth; thereafter, she earned approximately $20,000 by completing a couple of projects on a part-time basis. Ms. D.'s income remained in the $21,000 range after separation as a result of her decision to set up a private practice instead of working for a large established firm. The firm is gradually building a clientele, and Ms. D. can expect to earn much more than her current income as the firm grows. With her education, background and experience, she is capable of earning at least in the $45,000 to $50,000 range.

[205] Mr. T. is a graphic designer and talented carpenter. He is currently working as a carpenter but has the choice of returning to work as a graphic designer. Mr. T.'s income over the past few years had been in the $42,000 range. I conclude based on his evidence that he is capable of earning in at least the $45,000 to $50,000 range as well.

[206] Mr. T. has been paying child support since April 2009 in the amount of $388 per month based on a Guideline income of $42,000 per year. He continues to pay that amount.

[207] Ms. D. sought retroactive child support on the basis that Mr. T. ought to have been paying at least $388 per month commencing in December 2008 when the parties separated. I accept that Mr. T. owes Ms. D. four months of retroactive child support. Based on a monthly payment of $388, Mr. T. must pay Ms. D. $1,552.

[208] I have reviewed Mr. T.'s income tax returns for the past three years. I am satisfied that his Guideline income remains, on average, $42,000 per year. Mr. T. will continue to pay child support based on a Guideline income of $42,000.

[209] Going forward, V. will be living with each parent 50% of the time. Accordingly, Mr. T.'s ongoing child support obligations will be adjusted to take into account Ms. D.'s Guideline income. Based on the financial information Ms. D. filed at trial, I am prepared to accept that she has been earning, on average, $21,000 per annum (excluding the approximate amount of $4,800 she is currently receiving from Mr. T. for child support). A person earning that annual income is required under the Guidelines to pay $190 per month for child support. The difference between Mr. T.'s amount of $399 and Ms. D.'s amount of $190 is $209.

[210] Accordingly, going forward, Mr. T. will pay to Ms. D. $209 for basic child support. However, Ms. D. is capable of earning a significantly greater income than she earns at present. Her income is currently low because she is in the process of building a small private business. That level of income should not continue. If it does, Ms. D. will in all likelihood be required to seek employment elsewhere or have a higher income imputed to her. I am prepared to accept that for the next year, her income will remain at $21,000 for child support purposes (bearing in mind that she will receive, in addition, approximately $2,400 per annum in child support payments from Mr. T.). Thereafter, Ms. D. runs the risk of having a higher income imputed to her if her income remains at its current level.

[211] The parties will exchange income tax returns and assessments by June 30 of next year (and each year thereafter), and child support for V. may be adjusted in accordance with that information by agreement or by application by either party to vary the amount.

[212] The parties will bear equally all expenses relating to V.'s medical and dental care and all other health care expenses. They will also bear equally all expenses for ongoing activities such as swimming and soccer.

[213] Each party will bear the expense of any other extracurricular programs in which he or she chooses to enrol V. unless the parties otherwise agree.

E. Spousal Support

[214] Ms. D. sought retroactive spousal support, and spousal support going forward.

[215] I am not persuaded that this is an appropriate case for spousal support either retroactive or prospective.

[216] Under the federal Spousal Support Advisory Guidelines, a spouse earning $42,000 per year and paying $388 in child support may be obligated to pay $0 to $50 per month to a spouse earning $21,000 per year and receiving $388 in child support.

[217] Ms. D. was a mature adult with a degree in architecture and considerable work experience when she met Mr. T. She suffered no economic disadvantage from the marriage as that term is used in the case law. Ms. D. is as capable now, and was capable during the marriage, of pursuing work in her chosen field. She did so in fact. With her education and work experience, she is capable prospectively of enjoying an income level comparable to that of Mr. T. Further, Ms. D. can expect to earn income for a significantly longer period of time than Mr. T. Ms. D. is 41; Mr. T. is 55.

[218] Any economic hardship suffered as a result of the breakdown of the marriage is one suffered by Ms. D. and Mr. T. equally. The proceeds of the sale of the condominium have been reapportioned entirely to Ms. D. She has received an equal interest in the only other significant asset of the parties, the Pender Harbour property.

[219] Ms. D.'s claim for spousal support is dismissed.

F. Miscellaneous Claims

[220] Ms. D. made two additional claims. The first is for damages she alleges she suffered as a direct result of the ex parte order Mr. T. obtained in September 2009. The second is for the return of $2,100 in family funds taken surreptitiously by Mr. T. to start an RESP account for V. I will deal with these claims in turn.

[221] I have already recounted the circumstances which culminated in Mr. T.'s ex parte application in 2009. The parties had reached a stand-off concerning Mr. T.'s desire to have V. for overnight access. V. was three years of age. Ms. D. refused overnight access on the basis that V. was still breastfeeding and, for various other reasons, would not cope well. Mr. T.'s frustration level was high, and, as a result, he began acting in impulsive and immature ways. Ms. D. moved residences and, due to Mr. T.'s behaviour, refused to disclose her new address. It appears that Mr. T. convinced himself that Ms. D. was about to flee the province with V.

[222] Having heard all of the evidence concerning the circumstances existing at the time, I have little doubt that the ex parte application was ill-advised. In retrospect, it is evident that Mr. T. and his counsel showed poor judgment. However, I cannot conclude that Mr. T. acted in bad faith or misled the judge who issued the ex parte order.

[223] More importantly, Ms. D. advanced her arguments for damages to Crawford J. when she successfully applied to have the ex parte order set aside. Mr. Justice Crawford awarded her costs but did not see fit to make an award of damages.

[224] Ms. D. is not entitled to an award of damages with respect to the ex parte order.

[225] I will now address the matter of the RESP. I do not accept Ms. D.'s argument that Mr. T. acted fraudulently when he took family funds and applied them to an RESP for V. Both parents were entitled to the funds. Mr. T. misled Ms. D. but his conduct was not fraudulent.

[226] The RESP has been in place now for approximately four years. Under the plan, the federal government contributes an amount equal to 20% of the parents' contribution. It is in V.'s best interests that the fund continue to exist. Mr. T. receives the annual statements concerning the fund and has signing authority over it.

[227] I am prepared to accede to Ms. D.'s request to this extent: Ms. D. and Mr. T., as joint guardians of V., are both entitled to receive the annual statements and both are entitled to make contributions to the RESP if they so wish. The RESP will otherwise remain unchanged.

IV. SUMMARY OF ORDERS

[228] The following is a summary of the orders resulting from these reasons:

- 1) The parties shall have joint custody of V., including a shared parenting arrangement under which V. will spent alternating weeks with each party commencing the Tuesday of each week, and equal time with each parent during school vacation and significant holidays;
- 2) The parties shall have joint guardianship of V. with equal decision-making authority concerning all significant matters involving V.'s health, education and general welfare;
- 3) Mr. T. shall have ultimate decision-making authority on the issue of V.'s immunization;
- 4) Child support for V. shall be payable on the basis of the following Guideline incomes: Mr. T.: $42,000; Ms. D.: $21,000. The parties are at liberty to apply for a variance of child support after exchanging the requisite financial information on June 30, 2013 and at the same time each year thereafter;
- 5) The application by Ms. D. for spousal support is dismissed.

[229] As the parties are self-represented, they are at liberty to request clarification and directions from me concerning these reasons for judgment. The parties may reach me by email correspondence through the Registry.

[230] I will remain seized of this matter for the time being.

[231] As success has been divided, the parties will bear their own costs.

The Honourable Madam Justice C.A. Wedge
